Many survivors who have relocated don't want to share their personal information, especially their location, for fear that their abuser or stalker may find them. However, many survivors end up having to reveal their home address in order to receive mail, open bank accounts, apply for a driver's license, go to school, or get a job. This webinar will explore different ways survivors can minimize the sharing of their home addresses and personal information. The presenters will discuss a variety of strategies such as programs through the U.S. Postal Service and states' Address Confidentiality Programs. Problem solving strategies and tips will also be discussed.

This webinar is hosted by the National Network to End Domestic Violence as part of the Relocation Counseling and Identity Protection Initiative.
